Dissertation Title: Alliance and Cultural Affinity

Dissertation Committee: Sara McLaughlin Mitchell (Chair), Kelly M. Kadera, Brian Lai, Elizabeth Menninga, and Stephen Saideman (Carleton University)

Abstract: This research aims to comprehend the influence of cultural affinity in military alliances. While prior studies on alliances have elucidated the effectiveness and longevity of alliances through power aggregation and sunk costs, they have rarely delved into the significance of cultural similarity. This study posits that culture plays a pivotal role in alliance duration and deterrence. The research argues that cultural affinity among allies enhances cooperation, diminishes the likelihood of conflicts, and nurtures mutual understanding. It delves into the ways in which shared culture impacts alliance durations at both the dyadic and alliance levels, as well as its effect on the deterrence capabilities of defense alliances.

WORKING PAPERS

Saera Lee, When Allies Leave an Alliance

This dissertation chapter examines the impact of cultural similarity on ally's tendency to leave an alliance and I find that as dyadic cultural affinity of allies within an alliance is high, an ally is less likely to leave an alliance.

Saera Lee, Why Do Alliances Terminate?

Focused on the duration of an alliance, this dissertation chapter finds that alliance with high average cultural affinity is less likely to be terminated.

Saera Lee, Rise of Pacta Sunt Servanda, Systemic Norm of Alliance Termination

This research project argues that the norm of pacta sunt servanda (pacts made in good faith are binding) is established at a systemic level by alliances with high cultural affinity, leading to a decrease in alliance termination over time since 1950. The research finds that the average cultural affinity within alliances increases over time and this trend coincides with an increasing proportion of democratic states.

Kelly M. Kadera & Saera Lee, Cultural Affinity and Alliance Formation

In this project, we focus on systemic conditions on alliance formation and how systemic norm of pacta sunt servanda creates bad reputations for those states which have violated the terms of obligations and makes them less attractive to other states.

Saera Lee, Clash of Culture? Analyzing Huntington Using Network Analysis

This paper examines the applicability of Huntington's class civilization using cultural affinity latent variable and network analysis.

Saera Lee, Does Interaction Make North Korea Happier? Text Analysis on Rodong Shinmun after the Third Korean Summit

This paper examines the effects of the third Korean Summit on North Korea's perception of South Korea and the United States and finds that the Summit made North Korea to mention more on South Korea and the US, but in negative context.
